See more See lessGlow-in-the-dark slugs that track carbon on the ocean floor have been developed by Australian researchers, which would help to understand the dynamics of the world's oceans. A laser beam is shone through a layer of water containing plankton, producing a sheet of UV light that penetrates the ocean's seabed. The light is absorbed by the plankton, which fluoresces with a green light, and any sediment passing through the light sheet is briefly illuminated. Sediments with a high content of carbon emit more green light than sediments with a lower carbon content. Using the new technique, researchers could see the rate at which carbon sank on the bottom of the ocean over the past six years. The abundance of plankton can also be quantified, which means the researchers were also able to measure the growth and decay of phytoplankton in the water column. Lead researcher Professor David Beerling, from the University of Tasmania, said the technique would be able to tell when plankton bloomed and when they died. Artificial intelligence is one of the most widely discussed innovations of the modern age. It is slowly changing our entire lives and the world is slowly coming to grips with the reality of this evolution. In fact, there are multiple articles and books on the subject. I have recently read Matt Ridley's book, From Bacteria to Bach, and also Tim Harford's book, The Undercover Economist: How Deflation Works, and What It Means For Us, and they both paint a comprehensive picture of this truly amazing technology. Since it's virtually impossible to convey an entire story of artificial intelligence in a few paragraphs, I will be discussing a few fascinating and fascinating aspects. Artificial Intelligence is Shaping the Future of Machine Learning Artificial intelligence is continuously improving. It is very difficult to say that it has even reached the peak of development. The performance of the technology is constantly improving. As time passes, it will
